

This remarkable drawing, made on the spot by an English artist, gives an actual picture of an engagement between the Turks and Gen. Allenby's army, which conquered the Holy Land and captured Jerusalem. It shows the British repelling a charge of the enemy led by German officers.

Pasting the Kaiser was a favorite sport at a war bond bazaar in London. Purchasers of bonds received stickers which they put on a life size drawing until, as is fitting, William was entirely obliterated. Additional prizes of bonds were awarded the holders of "lucky numbered" stickers. It was a popular sport.

Photos, copyright, Underwood & Underwood.

Australian troops marching along a battle scarred road in Flanders to relieve their fellows in the front line trenches. War's havoc and wastage plainly revealed by the limbers cast aside to clear the way.

International Film Service

The aerial defences in England are becoming more and more efficient, each German raid doing less damage. On the last attempt two German Gothas were shot down. One of them landed in the sea but the other came down on dry land and was wrecked, as this picture shows. The crew was taken unharmed through a freak of chance.

German prisoners in large numbers are used by the Allies to bring in the wounded after a battle. This photograph shows a group of them carrying two litters from the field after the battle of Passchendaele. The horseman is an Australian soldier leading pack animals to the front, incidentally enjoying a cigarette.

International Film Service